to 6–7 children in the Bhaktapur area, demonstrated that even small, locally driven initiatives can create meaningful and sustainable educational outcomes.

The session significantly increased awareness among brick factory owners about their potential role in facilitating education by allocating space, coordinating with NGOs, and collaborating with Rotary clubs. Several participants expressed willingness to explore similar initiatives in their respective factories. Rotary members were also encouraged to take leadership in advocacy, resource mobilization, and partnership-building to expand education support programs for migrant children.

Overall, the program strengthened collective commitment toward inclusive education, promoted social responsibility among industrial stakeholders, and laid the groundwork for future collaboration aimed at improving literacy, reducing child labor risks, and supporting long-term child development and social inclusion in brick factory communities.
